Wired and Wireless Broadband Service for the Underserved

Access to the internet is essential today for everyone in the United States. The Internet provides a lifeline for crucial public safety, healthcare, education, and vital services. The COVID-19 pandemic has highlighted the fact that millions of people live without Internet access (or insufficient access) and suffer from the lack of vital Internet based services. For these citizens, and the many underserved communities they represent, the financial cost of Internet access is a barrier too high to overcome.

SeaKay is ready to help you today

The US Government under the Biden administration is taking action to address this problem. Tribal communities and historically black learning institutions have been given priority to receive funding for Internet access via the NTIA grant process. SeaKay is a non-profit organization helping underserved communities apply for this funding and assisting them in delivering Internet Services. SeaKay has a proven track record of helping both urban and rural communities obtain funding and create digital equity by delivering Internet services, providing equipment to users, and training to support and use these online services.

SeaKay can build partnerships in your community, including public agencies, NGO's, businesses, and philanthropic organizations to unite and focus their support for the Internet service deployment your community requires. SeaKay can also help you identify proven partners to deploy solutions that will ensure the operational success of your projects.
